

Silver Screen

BECAUSE OF THE MAGAZINE'S PRODUCTION SCHEDULE, my deadline for writing this puzzle coincided with the annual Academy Awards (the other Academy, the one based in Beverly Hills). As a result, I had Best Picture winners on my mind. I memorized all of them a few years back, as I was preparing for my appearance on Jeopardy! With a little searching, I was able to find the last few—to make sure this puzzle included one from every decade since the awards started in the late 1920s.

The following sonnet contains the anagrammed names of 14 Best Picture movies. The anagrams are of either one or two words. The two-word anagrams always involve consecutive words. The other words in the poem are meaningless, at least as far as clueing goes.

Unlike the “Hurricane” puzzle last year, there isn't any overlapping. It's one movie per line.

My favorite movie of all time is a Best Picture winner: The Best Years of Our Lives, which won in 1946. I would love to have put that one in, but I found it impossible to anagram in just one or two words. A big hint for you, then, is that most of the movies I chose for the puzzle have short titles. There's one from every decade since the 1920s, and because that makes 10, four decades are represented with two winners.

If you're a movie buff, or if you happen to be preparing for a quiz show, please try to get them all without consulting any references. If you do, let me know your time: I'll send you a personalized email response of congratulations and list you in the next issue! For those of you, most I'm sure, who do not happen to know that The Life of Emile Zola won in 1937 or even that The Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King won in 2003 (neither title is used in this puzzle, for obvious reasons), I recommend glancing at Wikipedia's page on Academy Awards for Best Picture for help.

Indie Director Shoots Action Film

I sacrifice and suffer for my art.
The gator laid an egg right on the set.
We misperceived the danger in its threat.
In tacit praise, at least she didn't fart.
My biopic on Plato touched the heart,
But it's been one long dearth, and I'm in debt.
The money guys have failed to halt me yet!
My gut performs wild stunts at each day's start.

I never know which way my moods may swing.
L'il Marni, an ecdysiast I know,
Says bubbeleh, we either live or die.
I want to live! To pant! To buy her bling!
To give my bun her ranch in Mexico,
A mojo nest, with lots of stimuli.

Previous Issue's Puzzle—Cryptic Acrostic 2.0

I apologize for forgetting to put letters as well as numbers inside the boxes in the diagram for this puzzle. It was a short quote, though, so I hope it didn't slow you down too much. For this puzzle I needed to get in touch with Scott Adams, to ask for the exact source of the quote. There are numerous collections of Dilbert, and I wanted to cite the proper collection's title. I found his contact info at his website, and I was gratified by how quickly Scott replied to my inquiry. He said the proper source would simply be "Dilbert," not one of the collections. That was fortunate, in a way, because a long title would have led to many more short words—no "chrysanthemum" or "makeshift."
